ATVing across rugged paths with the remnants of Hurricane Leslie.

With windshield wipers working over-time, we continued our journey south to the village of Robinsons and what we thought would be shelter from the storm. Instead, no sooner had we arrived and complained about our streaked mascara (not really true) than Ruth and Paul Gale of Pirate's Haven Adventures took us out on ATVs to show us firsthand the spectacular topography of the area.

For thousands of years glaciers pushed and scraped their way through Newfoundland, leaving trails of ice, rock and soil in their paths. Robinson's Head is the only place in the province where you can see the end of this process—and it's a wholly dramatic sight, as moraine meets ocean. And if it wasn't enough to see something I vaguely recall from tattered high school textbooks, Paul also told us that the beaches we were looking at, with their cliffs and caves, were the very ones pirates are believed to have hidden their treasures. So the question was, did we spend a wet and windy afternoon making our geography teachers proud...or hunt for buried gold? Well, me hearties, we'll best leave that unanswered!

Our one planned night in a cozy chalet turned to two, as Hurricane Leslie insisted we spend extra time with the aptly named Gales. Which just goes to show you that in Newfoundland, even the hurricanes are hospitable.
